For up to 3 months now we've been developing, testing and improving Mouse Click. Over this time, we've collected a lot of ideas, and we want to share the results with you. Mouse Click is a great and highly customizable utility that aims to automate your mouse clicks. Features: Mouse Gestures: Drag and drop buttons on a virtual canvas, perform mouse clicks and write down the coordinates in pixels when you click on it Cursor Tracking: Keep an eye on your mouse cursor's position during the mouse gesture and the cursor movements by clicking on the bottom edge of the window Real-Time Mouse Tracking: Add a target value to a certain pixel and our software will track the mouse automatically and automatically write down the coordinates Drag and Drop: Drag buttons over a virtual canvas and create a sequence Settings: Recognize hotkeys for specific actions Possibility to disable "auto-close" for the window Supports processes like Hyper-V or VirtualBox For now, there's not much of a point in getting an extended set of features, as the concept has been completely overhauled. Instead, a focus has been placed on simplifying the main features and the settings. We also tried to make the process as simple as possible, and the application now comes with a custom auto-install procedure, as well as a more thorough window for better understanding. Mouse Click is still in development, so we expect a new version in the near future. Download: What's missing in Mouse Click? X is free, and no one should stop using it. Coming from an older version of Linux desktop, I was used to the DE Tweaker tools available, which are actually very primitive. Even if you could turn on desktop effects, you had to wait for the next boot or restart of the system. With XFCE you can enable and disable desktop effects with a simple mouse click, and even navigate between them. After a lot of trial and error, trying to find the few relevant settings, and being frustrated with the fact that you had to restart the computer in order to be able to use desktop effects
