When retrospective analysis methods cannot provide definitive prognostic information on individual cohorts, then prospective studies may be required. From an ethical perspective, when patients are randomized to treatment groups based on information gained by retrospective analysis of other cohorts, there is significant loss of data and decreased power. Therefore, some groups consider it unethical to rely upon retrospective analysis (Gustafson and Modlin, [B19]; O'Hara et al., [B36]; Walther et al., [B53]). Protocol designs to ensure unbiased sampling should be developed for each individual study, and statistical analyses used to minimize bias. With respect to the Pareto principle, the most powerful studies will be those that prospectively plan for unbiased sampling, and ensure that retrospective analysis is unbiased. Author
