in this paper, i have shown that the direction of social mobility affects the well-being of young adults. this finding was supported by the results from six country groups, including for the first time the visegrád countries. the visegrád countries have been relatively understudied when it comes to identifying the effects of mobility on well-being. this is despite the fact that the population of the visegrád countries has been growing strongly for the past few decades. in addition, these countries have been experiencing an alarming increase in inter-ethnic conflicts. perhaps this is why the issue of social mobility has been neglected. further research is needed in this area and there is a clear need to determine which groups are vulnerable to negative mobility effects and what factors protect them from these effects. our second aim is to extend previous research by testing if the direction of mobility effects differ between countries. the results of previous studies have shown that upward mobility is a stronger determinant of swb than downward mobility (blau and duncan 1967 ; fenger 2007 ; kawachi 1998 ; monden and de graaf 2013). yet, it is unclear whether these findings apply to young adults in contemporary europe. in addition, there is ample evidence that the effects of mobility may depend on individual characteristics (stegmüller 2013 ; monden and de graaf 2013 ; kneale et al. 2016 ; cingolani et al. 2013) and on the duration of the transition period (stegmüller 2013 ; esping-andersen 1990 ; shkolnikov and besek 2006). therefore, in the present study, we investigate the relative strength of net mobility effects over and above origin and destination effects. for this, we apply two statistical models. the first model (model 1) includes the two main determinants of swb-own and parental education-and tests for net mobility effects, accounting for their origin and destination effects.
