Reggae Vibes: The Rise of the Indo Dancehall As the music industry continues to churn out a steady diet of reggae and dancehall acts from across the globe, it's easy to forget about the Jamaican roots of the genre. But as the aforementioned act Haile Rose reminds us, that is not the case at all. In the '80s, the 'Reggae Vibes' soundtrack was the perfect fusion of reggae and rap, and the East Indian sound that was first born in the Caribbean then became a phenomenon all over the world. Biggest success was reached by the vocal quartet Asia, which has taken the Indian sound to the world's stage, making the business of music in India and around the world. As we continue our 'Reggae Vibes' series, The Jamaican Society is giving Haile Rose the run of the place. The national drum of Jamaica is the bingy, a drum-shaped instrument that has four skins. These are used to create different patterns, as opposed to hitting the drum hard and fast, as other drums do. The bingy is the drum of the dancehall music genre and is played on every track of the genre. Whether it's a reggae song or dancehall, the bingy is still a prominent part of that sound. While most of the audience will not be familiar with the instrument, they will understand the beat. Haile Rose is Jamaican, but he is one of those rare people who can understand the nuances of Indian music. His repertoire includes Indian beats and grooves in his music. His latest release 'Tonic' has him paying homage to the bingy. "The bingy is the national instrument of Jamaica. When I made the song 'Tonic', my bingy was broken, so I used my keyboard and my harp," he says. 'Tonic' is the title track of the album, which also features 'Dum Gungung Gungoon'. Haile Rose was born in Kingston, Jamaica. While he was growing up, he listened to reggae, but it
